Along the way, I decided to add a category for Alzheimer's disease, a topic that I have way more experience with than I wish I had. With that, this blog is about both toxin free living and life without Alzheimer's disease! At first glance, Alzheimer's disease seems out of place with the other topics; perhaps it should have its own blog.

Introduction. People with dementia usually need more and more assistance with their personal hygiene. As the disease progresses, they may lose the ability to manipulate objects such as combs and toothbrushes. They might also forget what these objects are and, more important, what they are used for, forget that a task needs doing, be under the impression that it has already been done, or lose ...
