The Four Modernizations were first proposed in December 1964 by Chinese Premier Zhou Enlai (in office from 1949 until his death in 1976) but were not immediately implemented, as the ideology of the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), launched by Chinese Communist Party (CCP) Chairman Mao Zedong, took precedence. They were reintroduced by Zhou at the Fourth National People's Congress in 1975 and supported by Deng Xiaoping, who was deputy premier at the time.

However, the path of modernization and market-oriented economic reforms that China started since the early 1980s appears to be fundamentally unchallenged. Even critics of China's market reforms do not wish to see a backtrack of these two decades of reforms, but rather propose corrective measures to offset some of the social issues caused by existing reforms.
